Changing with the times

North America's largest material recovery facilities experienced challenges arising from the pandemic that affected material streams in 2020.

BY MEGAN SMALLEY

Material recovery facility (MRF) operators faced a variety of challenges in 2020. With more people working from home in light of the COVID-19 pandemic, MRF operators and haulers noticed an increase in residential generation. Commercial volumes, on the other hand, declined as many restaurants, retailers and offices shut down temporarily in response to lockdowns. Additionally, some MRF operators have reported that contamination levels increased in 2020 and into this year.

These changes likely affected some of the figures reported by MRF operators in Recycling Today's 2021 Map & List of North America's Largest MRFs because the list is based on tons of recyclables facilities shipped in 2020. Based on data reported to or estimated by Recycling Today, the 75 largest MRFs in North America shipped a total of nearly 5.8 million tons of recyclables in 2020. This number is down compared with the 2018 data we used to rank MRFs in our last list, which was published in 2019. That year, the 75 largest MRFs in North America shipped nearly 8.2 million tons of recyclables.

A combination of factors might have contributed to this general decline. Although inbound residential tons likely increased for a number of MRF operators in the last year, some report that residue rates are up, which could have affected the tons of recyclables that MRFs shipped. Decreased commercial generation also likely influenced the decline. (We don't ask MRFs to break out this information.) In some cases, collection issues arising from the pandemic could have influenced these figures, too.

Among the MRFs reporting lower tonnage figures compared with our previous list is Sims Municipal Recycling. The company's Sunset Park MRF in Brooklyn, New York, tops our list again, having shipped 230,600 tons of recyclables in 2020. Yet, this figure is down compared with the tons it shipped in previous years: 247,201 tons in 2018 and 241,884 tons in 2016.

The latest list also features a few new arrivals. Debuting near the top is Waste Management's (WM's) new Chicago-area MRF, based in Hodgkins, Illinois. That MRF ranked at No. 3, shipping 215,445 tons of material in 2020. Houston-based WM completed construction on that 150,000-square-foot facility in 2020.

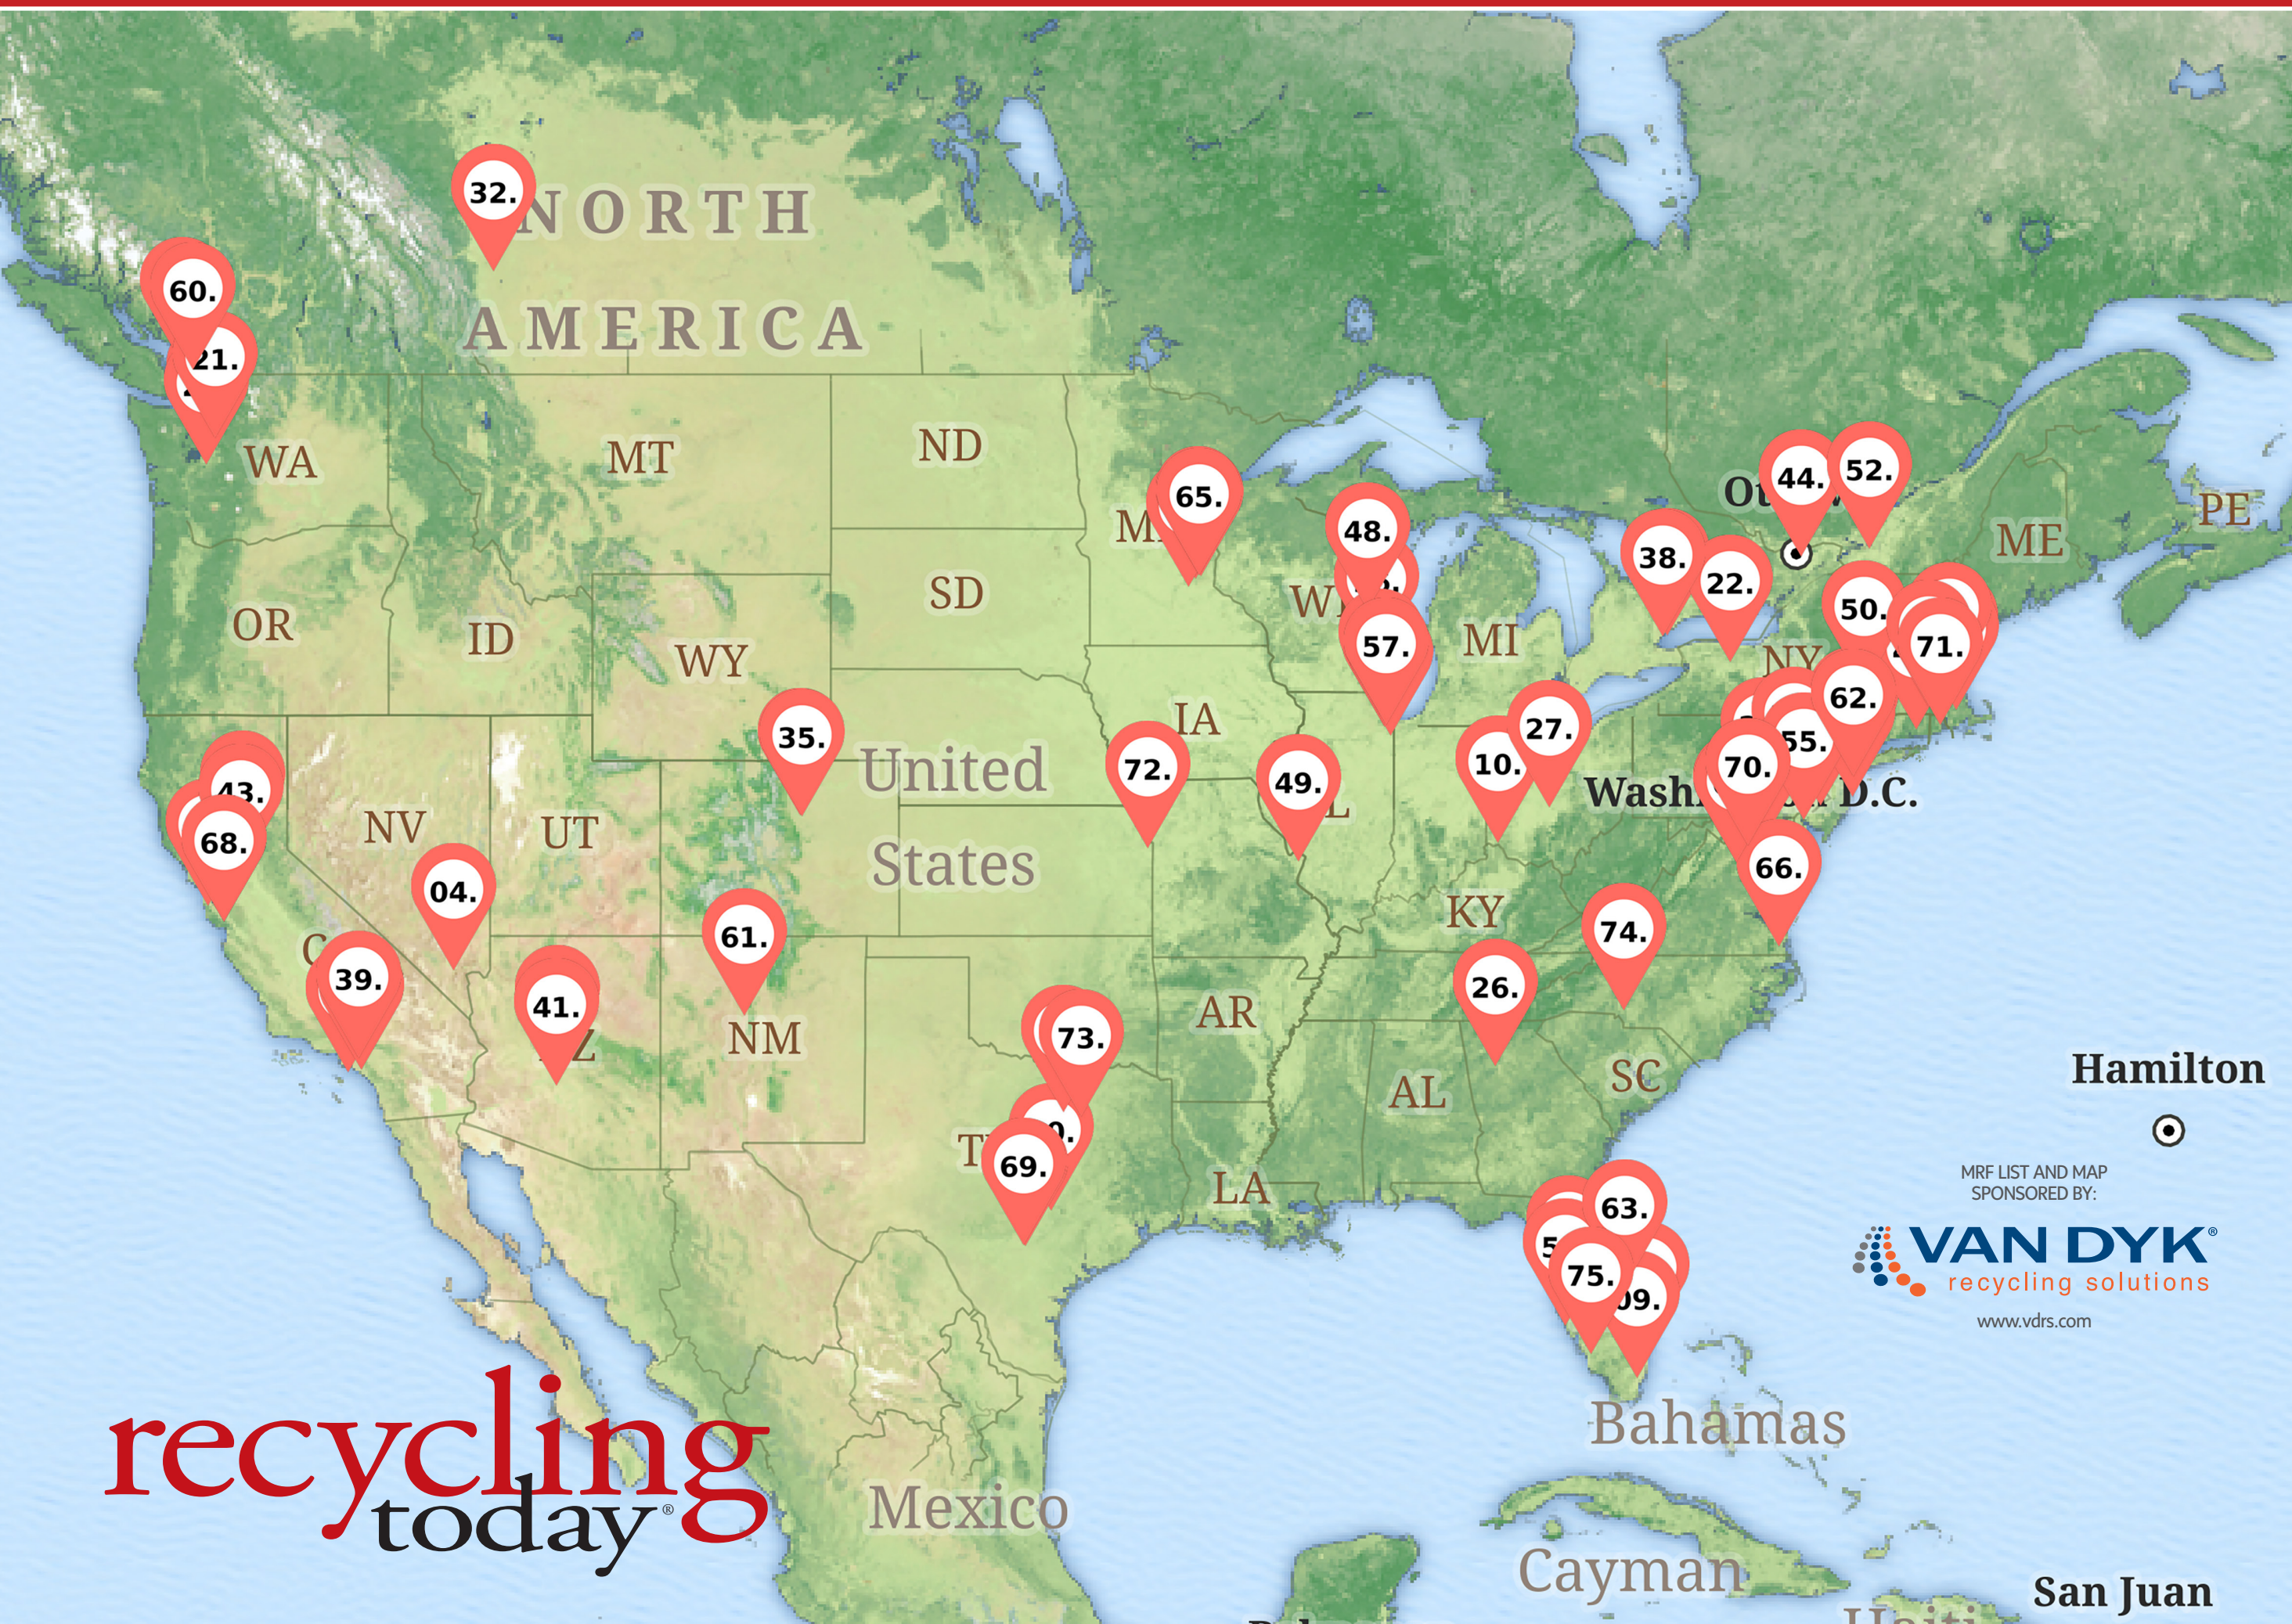

Mazza Recycling's Tinton Falls, New Jersey, MRF also is new to the list, having shipped 115,000 tons in 2020, ranking it in the No. 36 spot. Mazza opened its MRF early in 2020. According to the company, it was the first MRF on the East Coast to positively sort recyclables.
